the thesis of this book is simple though the arguments for it must range broadly the christian gospel proclaims an incarnational theology which implies an ethics of intimacy if either the incarnational theology or the ethics of intimacy is distorted the other suffers from this perspective god s purpose in creation and in the incarnation can be succinctly stated each of the three divine persons is passionately involved with each and every human being with a longing for deepening intimacy human beings who respond with a commitment to jesus christ are constantly called to a fully human uniquely personal existence because jesus christ fully human is personally involved with them with a passionate vulnerable respectful and faithful love from the author s introduction this book argues that the intimacy of human persons with each other and with god has been the point of christian ethics throughout history but that this metaphor of intimacy has been forced to compete with other metaphors in the christian tradition like that of power and judgment making use of the language theory of the later wittgenstein and of walter ong s orality literacy distinction fr j j s study seeks to illuminate the history of the metaphor of intimacy and thereby rejuvenate contemporary discourse on christian ethics
